Indiana Railroad

The Chicago and Western Indiana Railroad (reporting mark CWI) was the owner of Dearborn Station in Chicago and the trackage leading to it. It was owned equally by five of the railroads using it to reach the terminal, and kept those companies from needing their own lines into the city. With the closure of Dearborn Station in 1971 and the Calumet steel mills in 1985, the railroad was gradually downgraded until 1994 when it became a subsidiary of the Union Pacific Corporation.

Chicago And Western Indiana Railroad. One of Chicago's important but since forgotten belt lines was the Chicago & Western Indiana. It thrived during the heyday of rail travel, providing several railroads with a direct connection into Dearborn Station. The C&WI was the vision of John Brown who recognized a need for a single rail system to offer services into the growing city's downtown region.
