Health is political because the right to 'a standard of living adequate for health and well-being' ( United Nations, 1948) is, or should be, an aspect of citizenship and a human right. Ultimately, health is political because power is exercised over it as part of a wider economic, social and political system.

Public health and politics are two sides of the same coin. Just combining the words 'public' and 'health' makes a clear statement that health can only be achieved by the concerted action of many people who must work together in pursuit of a common goal. Acknowledging this raises questions, though: How should they work together?

COVID-19 has exposed critical failures in global public policy preparedness and response. The UK's response in particular is an archetype of how the pandemic has overwhelmed traditional public health-led approaches. Gemma Bowsher argues that pandemics are multivector threats meriting attention within a health intelligence framework.
