Transitional justice context should probably start with the recognition that symbolic practices like art production are a means to express the nomos – that set social narratives and interactions that, according to Robert Cover (1992), locates and constitutes any legal system – and to give observable, emotionally compelling form to its demands (144–5). The arts thus establish a particular rapport with law and justice-related practices in society ...

This can take various forms and one powerful form is through testimony including in the form of the arts. The five official mechanisms of transitional justice; criminal prosecutions, truth-seeking, reparations, memorials and institutional reform all work interdependently for a society to come to terms with a violent and painful past.
