University of Michigan Medical School – Practice Questions

Michigan's policy has encountered fierce on-campus criticism because the university requires the accused student—and not his lawyer—to conduct all cross-examination. Activists have not unreasonably criticized this approach, and the university's response (allowing lawyers to do the cross-examination would violate equity principles, even as Michigan is home to one of the nation's preeminent law schools whose faculty could be tapped for occasional pro bono work) is unconvincing.
